Introduction

In 2006, a new type of illegal immigration legislation began appearing in cities across the nation.² Growing anti-immigrant public sentiment had been putting increasing political pressure on local municipal governments to take action against illegal immigrants.³ That same year, city councils across the country began drafting ordinances that singled out illegal aliens.⁴ Aside from being intentionally discriminatory, these ordinances have been challenged on constitutional grounds.⁵ In the summer of 2006, an anti-immigrant ordinance was passed in Hazelton, Pennsylvania, and that was only the beginning.⁶ That year, several other similar ordinances were passed in cities across the nation.⁷ First, this Note will discuss the two primary catalysts of the general public's negative sentiment toward illegal immigrants: (1) economic concerns and (2) anxiety concerning increased criminal activity.⁸ Next, this Note will analyze the potential constitutional infirmities of the ordinances.⁹ After presenting a constitutional analysis, this Note will examine how courts will handle anti-immigrant legislation going forward.¹⁰ Finally, this Note will present alternative solutions to the problems that initially spawned these ordinances.¹¹ matters into their own hands.¹² For example, the mayor of Hazelton, Pennsylvania publicly blamed many of the city's criminal, economic, and social ills on illegal immigrants.¹³ He was quoted as stating: "Illegal immigrants are destroying the city. I don't want them here, period."¹⁴ On July 13, 2006, the city council in Hazelton, Pennsylvania, led by its mayor, approved the "City of Hazelton Illegal Immigration Relief Act Ordinance."¹⁵ Despite the fact that this ordinance was tailored to regulate the employment and housing of illegal immigrants, the mayor's statements made it clear that it was really an attempt to force illegal immigrants out of the city.¹⁶

Although Hazelton was the first city in the United States to pass such discriminatory legislation, it cannot be blamed for the recent wave of anti-immigrant public sentiment.¹⁷ A new attitude toward illegal immigrants took root in the southern border-states that lie along the U.S.-Mexico border, such as California.¹⁸ Early in 2006, a large group of citizens in San Bernardino, California, came together and began to rally local support for the "Save San Bernardino Initiative."¹⁹ The language used in the "Welcome" section on the Initiative's homepage illustrates the citizens' anti-immigrant sentiment and frustration with the federal government. It states:

Our state and federal government have been given enough time to stop illegal immigration. It is time that the residents of San Bernardino stand up and take matters into their own hands . . . [t]he 'City of San Bernardino Illegal Immigration Relief Act' will reverse the negative impacts of illegal immigration by aggressively and proactively targeting policies and entities that aid and abet illegal aliens.²⁰

This "Save San Bernardino" initiative group tried to pass a local ordinance entitled "The Illegal Immigration Relief Act," which would have: (1) stopped taxpayer-funded day laborer centers; (2) seized vehicles of those who hire day laborers; (3) punished businesses that aid and abet illegal aliens; (4) prohibited renting and leasing to illegal aliens; and (5) established an "English-only" policy.²¹ The ordinance barely lost by a vote of four to three.²²

Despite the fact that the proposed anti-immigrant ordinance failed to pass in San Bernardino, similar ordinances were still passed in many cities across the country, beginning with one in Hazelton, Pennsylvania.²³ Like the Hazelton ordinance, the ordinances passed by other cities were primarily aimed at regulating the employment and housing of illegal immigrants, but cities seemed to be attempting to use these regulations to achieve their ultimate goal of forcing illegal immigrants to leave their city.²⁴ This Note now shifts its focus to the primary causes that fueled the public's negative sentiment toward illegal immigrants: (1) economic concerns and (2) anxiety concerning the increase in criminal activity.

A. Economic Concerns

1. Public Opinion

One of the two primary causes of the general public's negative sentiment toward illegal immigrants is economic concerns. There are two basic economic concerns that have been expressed by the general public. One concern is that illegal immigrants will overburden the public government services, having a significantly negative fiscal impact on the nation's economy.²⁵ A Fox News & Opinion Dynamics Poll taken in April 2006—polling 900 registered voters—found that eighty-seven percent of polled registered voters were concerned that illegal immigration overburdens government programs and services.²⁶ The second basic concern is that illegal immigrants will take away jobs from U.S. citizens.²⁷ The same poll found that sixty-six percent of respondents were concerned that illegal immigration takes jobs away from U.S. citizens.²⁸ Contrary to the general public's opinion, this Note's analysis of the relevant statistical data demonstrates that illegal immigrants actually have a relatively insignificant economic impact on the nation.

24. See Dorrell, supra note 4 ("Hazelton's requirements are strict, but other communities are also targeting landlords and employers."); see also Tanner, supra note 2 ("Lawmakers and mayors, they want to make their area as inhospitable to aliens as possible." 2. Statistical and Fiscal Analysis

The role played by illegal immigrants in our current economy is reflected in statistical data. Currently, illegal workers constitute approximately twenty-four percent of farm workers and hold at least fourteen percent of construction jobs.²⁹ Moreover, unauthorized immigrants account for roughly five percent of the existing U.S. labor force.³⁰ These proportions show no sign of shrinking.³¹

The first economic concern to address is the public's fear that illegal immigrants will overburden government programs, resulting in a significant negative fiscal impact. Therefore, exactly what types of economic effects are these illegal immigrants having on our country? There is actually no compelling evidence to suggest that legal immigration is economically preferable to illegal immigration.³² Immigrants have the potential to cause both positive and negative fiscal effects on an economy.³³ For instance, they can generate a positive immigration surplus by raising U.S. productivity and making positive net tax contributions.³⁴ However, they can also generate a net fiscal burden by paying less in taxes than they receive in government benefits.³⁵ Thus, it is possible to make a rough calculation of the overall economic impact immigrants have on a country by simply netting the positive surplus with the negative burden figures.³⁶ In

(on file with the Washington and Lee Journal of Civil Rights and Social Justice).

30. See GORDON H. HANSON, THE ECONOMIC LOGIC OF ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION, COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS SPECIAL REPORT NO. 26, 24 (2007) [hereinafter HANSON], available at <http://www.cfr.org/content/publications/attachments/ImmigrationCSR26.pdf> (noting that unauthorized immigrants account for five percent of the U.S. labor force).

31. See id. at 32 (noting illegal immigration is a "persistent phenomenon").

32. See id. at 5 (discussing how illegal immigration responds to market forces in ways that legal immigration does not).

33. See id. at 4–5 (noting that although illegal immigration has obvious flaws, such as undermining the rule of law and weakening the ability of the U.S. government to enforce labor-market regulations, it also provides American businesses with the types of workers they want, when and where they want them).

34. See id. at 21 (suggesting that employment-based permanent immigrants and highly skilled temporary immigrants "have a positive net impact on the U.S. economy").

35. See id. (explaining that immigration creates a burden on taxpayers when immigrants consume more in government benefits than they pay in taxes).

36. See HANSON, supra note 30, at 21 ("The total impact of immigration on U.S. residents—the sum of the immigration surplus (the pretax income gain) and the net fiscal transfer from immigrants—would be unambiguously positive.").

1996, the National Research Council (NRC) estimated that immigration for that year imposed a fiscal burden on the average U.S. native household of 0.2% of the U.S. Gross Domestic Product (GDP).³⁷ For the same year, the immigration surplus was estimated at about 0.1% of GDP.³⁸ These calculations strongly suggest that in 1996 immigration reduced the annual income of U.S. residents by only about 0.1% of GDP.³⁹

The second economic concern to address is that illegal immigrants will take away jobs from U.S. citizens.⁴⁰ Despite the fact that a relatively large percentage of Americans believe this to be true, the statistical data shows that the general public is once again misguided in its economic concerns over illegal immigration.⁴¹ If it were true that illegal immigrants were taking away jobs from U.S. citizens, then there would be noticeable increases in the U.S. unemployment rate as the flow of illegal immigrants increased, and vice versa.⁴² However, when the relevant unemployment and immigration statistics are examined, it appears that there is little to no correlation between U.S. unemployment rates and illegal immigration rates.⁴³

It is important to note how minor the negative economic impact actually is compared to the relatively large role this topic plays in the public's overall illegal immigration debate.⁴⁴ Any actual negative economic impact illegal immigration is having on this country plays a disproportionately large role in shaping the average citizen's opinions on immigration.⁴⁵

B. Public Anxiety over Illegal Immigrants' Increased Correlation to Criminal Activity

1. Statistical Data and Public Opinion

In the past decade, there has been a growing public sentiment that illegal immigrants are linked to increases in crime.⁴⁶ An example of this public opinion can be seen on the "Save San Bernardino Initiative" homepage, which states: "Illegal aliens are criminals by definition. Illegal aliens simply bring more crime into our neighborhoods. We are talking about an illegal population and subsequent black market economy that must be present in order to facilitate and service them."⁴⁷ A Fox News & Opinion Dynamics Poll taken in April 2006—polling 900 registered voters—found that seventy-five percent were concerned that illegal immigration will lead to an increase in crime.⁴⁸ In addition, a Time magazine national poll taken in January 2006—polling 1,002 adults—found that forty percent were "very concerned" that illegal immigrants increase crime.⁴⁹ The public opinion polls show that by 2006, many Americans believed that illegal immigrants were responsible for the increase in crime.⁵⁰ An analysis of the statistical data reveals that this public sentiment is, in fact, correct.⁵¹

There is a factual link between the increase in illegal immigrants coming into this country from the U.S.-Mexico border and the rise in crime levels.⁵² In the 1990s, both legal and illegal immigration from Mexico surged to unprecedented levels.⁵³ At the same time, there was a significant positive correlation with the sharp increase in incidences of violent crimes.⁵⁴ This correlation has been linked to the increase in the extensive drug smuggling activity occurring along the U.S.-Mexico border.⁵⁵ The increase in smuggling activity at the southern border of the United States can be directly linked to a shift in power of the major drug cartels.⁵⁶ According to proceedings from a 1997 meeting of the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration and Claims: "Through other violations of our immigration laws, Mexican drug cartels are able to extend their command and control into the United States. Drug smuggling fosters, subsidizes, and is dependent upon continued illegal immigration and alien smuggling."⁵⁷ As the power of the Columbian drug cartels crumbled, new cartels from Mexico became the major suppliers of illegal narcotics to the United States.⁵⁸ The driving historical forces that led to the current structure of power in the illegal drug trade are examined in the next Part, which discusses both the background of the drug trade and its newfound ties to illegal immigrants.

2. Background of the Drug Trade

In this country, the underground drug trade represents a powerful black market in which billions of dollars worth of illegal narcotics are bought and sold annually.⁵⁹ By 1994, it was estimated that the underground black market for illegal narcotics accounted for approximately 9.4%—or $650 billion—of the total U.S. GDP.⁶⁰ When the federal government undertook its "War on Drugs," the black market for illegal narcotics grew rapidly, along with the organized crime rings that dealt in this extremely lucrative drug trade.⁶¹ This sudden growth in organized crime closely mirrors what occurred in this country during the Prohibition Era.⁶²

After Congress passed the Eighteenth Amendment banning all alcoholic beverages,⁶³ an underground black market for alcohol instantly came into being.⁶⁴ From 1920 to 1933, the government's prohibition of alcohol led to a rise in organized crime and widespread trafficking of alcohol.⁶⁵ As a result, the nation's organized crime syndicates, such as the one led by the infamous Al Capone, grew exponentially.⁶⁶ "At the height of the Prohibition, Americans were spending about $5 billion annually on alcohol This black market constituted about 5 of the U.S. gross national product at the time."⁶⁷ This figure is equivalent to about $79

billion in today's dollars.⁶⁸ After thirteen years, the government eventually realized the futility of trying to enforce the prohibition laws, and, in 1933, Congress passed the Twenty-First Amendment, repealing the ban on alcohol.⁶⁹ By repealing the Eighteenth Amendment, the government immediately eliminated the black market and the nation saw a corresponding decline in the involvement of organized crime in the sale of alcohol.⁷⁰

In the late 1970s, when the black market for narcotics began to expand, the Columbian drug cartel soon became the major supplier of drugs for the United States.⁷¹ An incredibly high demand for drugs combined with the extremely harsh criminal penalties being handed down for drug trafficking made selling drugs an extremely lucrative business.⁷² Up to the early 1990s, the Columbian drug cartels controlled the black market for narcotics.⁷³ A critical change in the cartel's leadership led to the powerful Columbian cartel's downfall; however, the strong and reliable demand for narcotics remained unchanged.⁷⁴ As the Columbian cartels declined in power, Mexican drug cartels located along the U.S.-Mexico border grew quickly to meet the demand.⁷⁵

The devastating methamphetamine epidemic that swept across the nation in the late 1990s helped to fuel the growth of the Mexican cartels.⁷⁶ According to the Drug Enforcement Agency, as of 2005, approximately sixty-five percent of all methamphetamine consumed in the United States came from Mexican drug cartels.⁷⁷ By the turn of the century, Mexican drug cartels had established themselves as the primary transporters of narcotics into the United States.⁷⁸ The cartels started using illegal immigrants to smuggle drugs over the U.S.-Mexico border.⁷⁹ As the Mexican cartels became increasingly more organized and sophisticated, their creative methods of drug smuggling followed suit.⁸⁰ In 2003, U.S. authorities discovered elaborate underground tunnels hidden beneath the U.S.-Mexico border.⁸¹ These tunnels allowed the cartels to funnel substantial amounts of drugs into the United States, continuing their use of illegal immigrants as "mules" despite increased border security.⁸² The Congressional Research Service even published a report to Congress detailing the increased violence in the border area, including kidnapping of Americans.⁸³

II. Discriminatory Local Ordinances

The following are brief case summaries that pertain to relevant anti-immigrant ordinances passed in 2006 and thereafter that are arguably unconstitutional.

A. Primary Examples

1. Lozano v. Hazleton⁸⁴

The Hazleton case was the first of its kind to bring the issue of discriminatory, anti-immigrant legislation to the forefront of legal and political debate.⁸⁵ The social climate in the city of Hazleton, Pennsylvania reached a boiling point in the summer of 2006.⁸⁶ The mayor, along with the majority of the city's legal residents, blamed most of the city's criminal, social, and economic ills on illegal immigrants.⁸⁷ The mayor pushed several anti-immigrant ordinances through city hall.⁸⁸ These ordinances were tailored to regulate the employment and housing of illegal immigrants,⁸⁹ however, it appeared that their true intent was to drive illegal immigrants out of the city.⁹⁰ Shortly after the Hazleton ordinance was

85. See Linda Kaiser Conley & Ilan Rosenberg, The Eye of the Storm, PA. LAW. 36 (2007) (stating that the city's ordinances were the first of their kind in the nation).

86. See Campbell, supra note 3, at 1042–44 (outlining the legislation passed in Hazleton in 2006, and its subsequent effects on the community).

88. See Conley & Rosenberg, supra note 85, at 35 (describing the Mayor's push to pass the city ordinances).

89. See id. ("In the summer of 2006, blaming many of the city's criminal, economic and social ills on 'illegal aliens,' Hazleton's mayor pushed through city council several ordinances designed to regulate the housing and employment of those viewed as unlawfully present in the United States.").

passed in the summer of 2006, the nation saw a subsequent flurry of litigation related to anti-immigrant ordinances that had been passed all over the country.⁹¹ Those ordinances are addressed below.

2. Riverside Coalition v. Riverside⁹²

In October 2006, the ACLU filed suit against the city of Riverside, New Jersey in the Superior Court of New Jersey, alleging that the city's proposed anti-immigrant ordinance was unconstitutional.⁹³ The ordinance called for fines of up to two thousand dollars to be levied against anyone who knowingly hired or rented to illegal immigrants.⁹⁴ Additionally, the ordinance contained a provision allowing the city to revoke business permits for up to five years if employers knowingly hire illegal immigrants.⁹⁵

3. Garrett v. Escondido⁹⁶

In early November 2006, various civil rights groups in the City of Escondido, California formed a coalition and filed a complaint against the city on behalf of landlords, tenants, and community groups.⁹⁷ A local ordinance recently passed made it illegal to rent property to illegal aliens in the City of Escondido.⁹⁸ The coalition challenged the ordinance as unconstitutional for three reasons. First, they contended that the ordinance directly violated federal immigration laws and that the federal government has exclusive jurisdiction to create and enforce immigration laws.⁹⁹ Second, they alleged that the ordinance violated the contract rights of the landlords and tenants.¹⁰⁰ Finally, the coalition argued that the city's ordinance violated federal fair housing laws and, therefore, violated the Due Process Clause.¹⁰¹

4. Reynolds v. Valley Park¹⁰²

In the summer of 2006, the city council of Valley Park, Missouri voted to pass Ordinance No. 1708.¹⁰³ This particular ordinance made it illegal to hire or attempt to hire any illegal aliens or rent property to such persons.¹⁰⁴ The ordinance also contained an "English Only" provision.¹⁰⁵

On November 13, 2006, the city of Farmer's Branch, Texas, passed Ordinance No. 2892.¹⁰⁷ This ordinance required proof of citizenship or residency in order to rent from a landlord.¹⁰⁸

B. Potential Unconstitutionality of Local Ordinances

As more local governments began passing anti-immigrant ordinances, civil rights groups and other like-minded legal factions began a collective rally to challenge their constitutionality.¹⁰⁹ As of the date of writing this Note, the constitutionality of these ordinances had not been addressed by the Supreme Court.¹¹⁰ But the Supreme Court will have the opportunity to grant certiorari to Hazleton as the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit issued its opinion finding the ordinance to be unconstitutional.¹¹¹

Jan. 10, 2007), available at <http://www.clearinghouse.net/detail.php?id=5539> (challenging an ordinance which would have required landlords to check tenants' U.S. Citizenship or eligible immigration status before renting to them) (on file with the Washington and Lee Journal of Civil Rights and Social Justice).

111. See Lozano v. City of Hazleton, No. 07-3531, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 18835, at *138, *153 (3d Cir. Sept. 9, 2010) (finding that Hazleton's ordinances regulating employment of undocumented immigrants and provision of housing to undocumented immigrants were preempted by the Federal Immigration Reform and Control Act).

The city's mayor has already promised to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.¹¹²

The constitutional infirmities of these local ordinances can be separated into two distinct groups. Ordinances that fall into the first group violate the concept of preemption set forth in the Supremacy Clause of the U.S. Constitution.¹¹³ If it is determined that a local ordinance is preempted by federal law, these ordinances are almost always unconstitutional.¹¹⁴ Ordinances that fall into the second group present more complex questions of constitutionality.

1. Preemption and the Supremacy Clause

The Supremacy Clause of the U.S. Constitution establishes that the Constitution, federal statutes, and U.S. treaties are to be treated as "the supreme law of the land."¹¹⁵ The U.S. Supreme Court has held that the regulation of immigration "is unquestionably exclusively a federal power."¹¹⁶ The Supreme Court has ruled that state or local law attempting to regulate immigration will be invalid if: (1) Congress shows any intent to occupy a given field of law; (2) the state law conflicts with federal law, meaning, it is impossible to comply with both state and federal law; or (3) the state law acts as an obstacle to the accomplishment of the full purposes and objectives of Congress.¹¹⁷ Since immigration law is under the almost exclusive control of the Federal Government, the recent attempts of local governments to regulate illegal immigrants by enacting and enforcing local immigration ordinances exceeds the power delegated to municipal governments.¹¹⁸

Comm'n*, 461 U.S. 190, 203-04 (1983) (discussing the test used to determine if federal law preempts state law).

118. See DeCanas, 424 U.S. at 354 (stating that the U.S. Constitution gives the federal government exclusive control over immigration matters).

In 1952, Congress passed the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA), which restricts immigration into the United States.¹¹⁹ Because the INA governs the substantive area of law that local anti-immigrant ordinances attempt to regulate,¹²⁰ these local ordinances are preempted by the Supremacy Clause.¹²¹ As a result, any local ordinance which attempts to regulate illegal immigration will most likely be preempted by federal law and subsequently struck down as unconstitutional.¹²²

2. Other Potential Constitutional Infirmities

The local anti-immigrant ordinances are arguably unconstitutional for four other reasons: they violate the First Amendment, the Contract Clause, the Equal Protection Clause, and the Due Process Clause. Unlike a challenge under the Supremacy Clause, a challenge for one of these four reasons requires the court to decide the threshold question: Whether illegal immigrants targeted by an ordinance are entitled to enjoy the rights of U.S. citizens granted in the U.S. Constitution?¹²³ The Supreme Court's current jurisprudence does not definitively answer this question.¹²⁴ As a result, this Note argues that the arguments for an ordinance's unconstitutionality for these reasons are weaker.

In 1982, the Supreme Court in Plyler v. Doe,¹²⁵ asserted that illegal immigrants did have the constitutional rights of Due Process and Equal Protection.¹²⁶ However, in 1990, the Supreme Court clarified and Verdugo-Urquidez*,¹²⁷ the Supreme Court stated: "[T]hose cases in which aliens have been determined to enjoy certain constitutional rights establish only that aliens receive such protections when they have come within the territory of, and have developed substantial connections with, this country."¹²⁸ The Supreme Court reiterated the finding of Chew v. Colding:¹²⁹ "The Bill of Rights is a futile authority for the alien seeking admission for the first time to these shores. But once an alien lawfully enters and resides in this country he becomes invested with the rights guaranteed by the Constitution to all people within our borders."¹³⁰ With United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez,¹³¹ standing as the Supreme Court's most recent ruling on this issue, it is questionable whether the illegal immigrants targeted by the local ordinances are entitled to each of the four constitutional rights at issue. The determination is likely to hinge on whether said illegal immigrants have "developed substantial connections with, this country."¹³²

a. First Amendment Violations

The First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution guarantees the right to free speech.¹³³ Most of these anti-immigrant ordinances, such as those seen in the Hazelton and Reynolds cases, contain some form of an "English

Only" provision.¹³⁴ The San Bernardino Initiative's proposed ordinance, entitled the "Illegal Immigration Relief Act," also contained an "English Only" provision.¹³⁵ In fact, the text found in San Bernardino's proposed ordinance is a good example of a typical "English Only" provision. It states: "Unless explicitly mandated by the federal government, the state of California or the county of San Bernardino, all official city business, forms, documents, signage, telecommunication or electronic communication devices will be conducted or written in or utilize English only."¹³⁶

These "English Only" provisions found in the majority of the anti-immigrant ordinances violate the First Amendment's free speech rights of those immigrants who cannot speak or write in English.¹³⁷ Formally banning other languages from being recognized as acceptable means of communicating public business effectively strips all non-English speakers of the ability to express themselves in public forums.¹³⁸ In Meyer v. Nebraska,¹³⁹ the U.S. Supreme Court stated:

The protection of the Constitution extends to all, to those who speak other languages as well as to those born with English on the tongue. Perhaps it would be highly advantageous if all had ready understanding of our ordinary speech, but this cannot be coerced by methods which conflict with the Constitution—a desirable end cannot be promoted by prohibited means.¹⁴⁰

The majority of the previously mentioned local ordinances had "English Only" clauses written into them; therefore, these ordinances would be unconstitutional if they targeted illegal immigrants who are entitled to the constitutional rights guaranteed by the First Amendment.¹⁴¹

b. Contract Clause

The Contract Clause of the U.S. Constitution guarantees people the right to make and enforce private contracts without governmental interference.¹⁴² The Supreme Court's current test of what constitutes a violation of an individual's constitutional right to contract was presented in Energy Reserves Group v. Kansas Power & Light.¹⁴³ In Energy Reserves Group, the Supreme Court set out a three-part test to determine whether a local or state law violates the Contract Clause.¹⁴⁴ First, the test states that the regulation must substantially impair a contractual relationship.¹⁴⁵ Second, the State must show there was a "significant and legitimate purpose" behind the regulation, such as attempting to remedy a broad and general social or economic problem.¹⁴⁶ Third, the test states that the

No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

proposed law must be reasonable and appropriate for its intended purpose.¹⁴⁷

The above test is the standard that should apply whenever an individual alleges that his right to contract has been unconstitutionally violated. In Garrett v. Escondido,¹⁴⁸ attorneys for various civil rights groups filed a complaint against the City of Escondido, alleging that it violated the contract rights of landlords and tenants when it passed its local ordinance because the ordinance made it illegal to rent property to illegal aliens.¹⁴⁹ On December 11, 2006, Judge John Houston of the United States District Court for the Southern District of California agreed and held that the ordinance did unconstitutionally violate the Contract Clause.¹⁵⁰ Judge Houston placed a permanent injunction barring the City of Escondido from enforcing its ordinance in perpetuity.¹⁵¹ Although this decision indicates that making it illegal to rent property to illegal immigrants is a violation of constitutionally protected contract rights, there is currently no Supreme Court jurisprudence that addresses this issue. As a result, a disproportionately small number of plaintiffs who have challenged these ordinances have argued that the Contract Clause was violated.¹⁵² The other potential constitutional infirmities discussed in this Note have more guiding Supreme Court precedent.

c. Equal Protection Clause

The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment states: "Nor shall any State . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."¹⁵³ If a U.S. law denies a right to some citizens but not all, it can be challenged under the Equal Protection Clause.¹⁵⁴ Furthermore, existing Supreme Court jurisprudence suggests that the Equal Protection Clause extends not only to U.S. citizens, but to every person living within its borders, including aliens.¹⁵⁵ In Torao Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission,¹⁵⁶ the Supreme Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment protects "all persons" against state legislation.¹⁵⁷ The Court went on to state: "The Fourteenth Amendment and the laws adopted under its authority thus embody a general policy that all persons lawfully in this country shall abide 'in any state' on an equality of legal privileges with all citizens under non-discriminatory laws."¹⁵⁸

More recent Supreme Court holdings, which analyze the Civil Rights Act, have narrowed the focus of the Equal Protection Clause's applicability to the anti-immigrant ordinances.¹⁵⁹ Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 states: "No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance."¹⁶⁰ The Supreme Court has held that intentional discrimination on the part of any entity that receives federal funds and violates the Equal Protection Clause also violates Title VI of the Civil Rights Act.¹⁶¹ Because all U.S. cities receive some type of federal funding,¹⁶² they are in violation of Title VI if they enact "English Only" ordinances and deny municipal services, such as public education, to non-English speaking individuals.¹⁶³

d. Due Process Clause

The Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution contains the Due Process Clause, which reads: "[N]or shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law"¹⁶⁴ Many of the local anti-immigrant ordinances potentially violate the Due Process Clause.¹⁶⁵ For example, nearly all of these ordinances impose some type of civil or criminal penalty upon an employer for hiring, or attempting to hire, an illegal immigrant.¹⁶⁶ Imposing such penalties automatically upon employers without giving them an opportunity to defend themselves presents a potential Due Process violation.¹⁶⁷ Other potential Due Process Clause violations exist because the language of the ordinance is vague.¹⁶⁸ For instance, the Hazelton Ordinance states:

An employer is guilty of aiding and abetting an illegal immigrant if they [sic] are found to have engaged in funding, providing goods and services to or aiding in the establishment or continuation of any day labor center or other entity providing similar services, unless the entity acts with due diligence to verify the legal work status of all persons whom it employs¹⁶⁹

Because the ordinance does not give an exact definition of what constitutes "due diligence," the entire ordinance is arguably vague, which potentially violates the employer's right to due process.¹⁷⁰

A final example of a due process violation present in many local ordinances is in Bright Lights, Inc. v. City of Newport,¹⁷¹ the court held that the plaintiff's right to due process was violated when the city denied her the opportunity to defend herself by demonstrating she did not have actual or constructive knowledge of the illegal acts of her employees.¹⁷²

III. Future Jurisprudence

The Hazleton Ordinance was the first to be challenged in federal court.¹⁷³ However, the Hazleton decision and those that followed it have not yet resolved the constitutional issues.¹⁷⁴ And the Supreme Court has yet to render its opinion.¹⁷⁵ But the day for the Supreme Court to speak might be rapidly approaching.¹⁷⁶

The Supreme Court could hold that these anti-immigrant local ordinances are unconstitutional attempts to regulate illegal immigration to some degree; therefore, they are preempted by federal law and should be struck down as unconstitutional.¹⁷⁷ Whether the Supreme Court could find that the ordinances are unconstitutional because they deny constitutional rights to illegal immigrants is more difficult to predict.¹⁷⁸ As noted earlier, the Supreme Court's current jurisprudence regarding whether illegal immigrants are entitled to constitutional rights is still ambiguous.¹⁷⁹ The determining factor appears to be whether or not the illegal immigrant in question has developed substantial connections with this country.¹⁸⁰ As a result, it is likely that geography will play an important factor in determining whether or not illegal immigrants residing in a particular area are entitled to the benefits and protections of the four constitutional rights discussed in this Note.¹⁸¹ Illegal immigrants living deeper inside the United States may be more likely to be viewed as having developed a substantial connection with this country than those living in the border states.¹⁸² In addition, only two of the four potential constitutional rights, the Due Process Clause and the Equal Protection Clause, were specifically mentioned by the Court in the Verdugo-Urquidez case.¹⁸³ This indicates that, in the future, the Court may be more likely to find that a given set of illegal immigrants is entitled to enjoy those two constitutional rights, to the exclusion of the others.

The holding of a lower court on the issue of whether illegal immigrants are entitled to constitutional rights is notable. In July 2007, U.S. District Court Judge James Munley ruled against the city of Hazleton, finding that the Hazleton Ordinance was preempted by federal law and violated the plaintiffs' due process rights.¹⁸⁴ Obviously, lower court

IV. Alternative Solutions

As this Note suggests, the vast majority of local anti-immigrant ordinances are unconstitutional on many levels.¹⁸⁵ It is entirely possible that the Supreme Court will take on this issue and hold that they are unconstitutional. Therefore, these local ordinances are obviously not a viable permanent solution that will fix cities' perceived illegal immigration problems. This Note argues a feasible long-term solution can be created with a two-pronged approach that entails: (1) drafting new federal legislation and (2) re-evaluating the current federal budget allocations being spent to enforce the nation's drug laws.

A. New Federal Legislation

The Clear Law Enforcement for Criminal Alien Removal Act (CLEAR Act) was a bill proposed in 2005.¹⁸⁶ The goal of the bill is to provide for enhanced federal, state, and local assistance in the enforcement of the immigration laws.¹⁸⁷ The CLEAR Act intended to improve upon existing immigration agencies, such as the Department of Homeland Security and the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), in order to more effectively address the current illegal immigration issues.¹⁸⁸ Theoretically, once it was passed, local governments would no longer feel the need to pass local anti-immigrant ordinances.¹⁸⁹ This bill never became law; it was merely referred to the House of Representatives, but did not go further.¹⁹⁰ Reinforcing existing immigration agencies could take pressure off of local and state governments to pass anti-immigrant legislation and could be part of a permanent solution.¹⁹¹ Congress should continue to pursue this bill or one similar to the CLEAR Act.

B. Federal Budget Allocations Spent on Enforcing Drug Laws

In addition to reinforcing federal immigration agencies, the government should also re-evaluate the money currently allocated to enforcing the nation's drug laws. By amending the nation's current drug laws and budget allocation policies, the government could become more effective in curtailing the supply side of the narcotics black market. As this Note already mentioned, there is a correlation between the increase in the flow of illegal immigrants entering the country at the U.S.-Mexico border and the increase in crime rates.¹⁹² Furthermore, many illegal immigrants aid the Mexican drug cartels by trafficking drugs into the United States.¹⁹³ The United States' recent meth epidemic has only fueled the growth of the Mexican cartels.¹⁹⁴

Currently, the U.S. government allocates a significant amount of funding for the purpose of enforcing ineffective drug laws.¹⁹⁵ In 2008, the government's annual budget for enforcing drug laws was approximately

$14.1 billion.¹⁹⁶ Each year, a large portion of that annual budget is spent enforcing the current drug laws within our own borders.¹⁹⁷ In the last two decades, over ten million American citizens have been arrested for marijuana offenses.¹⁹⁸ Approximately a quarter of a million of those who faced criminal charges for marijuana possession were convicted of a felony and sentenced to prison for at least one year.¹⁹⁹ In 1970, before our government started its War on Drugs, there were 3,384 marijuana drug offenders serving time in federal prison.²⁰⁰ Today, that number has increased to over 68,000.²⁰¹ Many of these inmates are first-time offenders with no prior criminal record.²⁰²

As alarming as those statistics are, they are only the tip of the iceberg. A recent statistical analysis of the criminal justice system showed that approximately one in 100 American citizens are currently incarcerated.²⁰³ This means that the United States currently has more people in prison than any other country.²⁰⁴ On average, about twenty percent of all inmates in America are serving time for drug related charges.²⁰⁵ Our nation's current drug laws have the government spending billions and billions of dollars each year arresting, prosecuting, and incarcerating our nation's citizens for minor drug offenses.²⁰⁶

The past three decades have shown that this strategy is simply not effective.²⁰⁷ Instead, our government should focus on shutting down the Mexican cartels that are currently supplying the majority of the drugs to the United States. By decriminalizing marijuana, reducing the criminal penalties for simple possession offenses, and repealing the federal mandatory minimum sentencing guidelines for drug offenses, the black market for drugs will naturally shrink on its own.²⁰⁸ This allows for a smaller allocation of government funds to be spent enforcing drug laws within our borders.²⁰⁹ The money that is left over could be spent on shutting down the supply side of the black market—the Mexican cartels.

By amending the nation's drug laws to allow the government to be more effective in curtailing the Mexican cartels that are the main suppliers of drugs to the United States, the government could then lower crime rates by reducing drug smuggling activities along the nation's southern border with Mexico. Reducing crime rates would, in turn, reduce the public's overall perception that illegal immigrants are responsible for the criminal activities in their cities. This would reduce the political pressure the public is exerting on its local governments to pass anti-immigrant ordinances.

V. Conclusion

In conclusion, the recent anti-immigrant ordinances that were passed in many cities across the country are a product of the public's growing negative sentiment toward illegal immigrants.²¹⁰ This negative sentiment primarily originates from two main public concerns: (1) economic concerns and (2) concerns that illegal immigrants are causing increased levels of criminal activity.²¹¹ Many of the public's economic concerns are misguided, while in the alternative, its concerns regarding increased criminal activity associated with illegal immigrants are valid.²¹² For example, following the rise of the Mexican drug cartels in the 1990s, illegal immigrants have increasingly participated in the drug trade and its associated criminal activities.²¹³ A constitutional analysis of the current local anti-immigrant ordinances reveals that they are likely to be found unconstitutional on several levels.²¹⁴ A permanent solution should be designed to remedy the cause of the public's negative sentiment toward illegal immigrants. By improving the public's overall negative attitude toward illegal immigrants, the U.S. government can reduce the pressure currently being exerted by citizens on local city councils to pass anti-immigrant ordinances that are not only discriminatory but also unconstitutional.
